Louise Rebecca Chapman is a philosopher and academic entrepreneur whose career combines research excellence with institution-building. She graduated with First-Class Honours in Philosophy from King's College London, completed the MSt in Ancient Philosophy at the University of Oxford (where she was thereafter offered an unconditional DPhil place at the Faculty of Philosophy), and eventually read for a doctorate at the University of Cambridge (Pembroke College) on Kant's account of moral exemplarity. Offered more than £250k in scholarships and fellowships for her postgraduate research, she has published and presented internationally on Kant and Plato, and remains an active researcher. Louise is keen to show that business leadership and philosophical scholarship are not mutually exclusive.

Alongside her academic career, Louise is the founder and CEO of Lex Academic®, a multi-million-pound enterprise employing five permanent staff and serving more than 2,500 clients worldwide. Established to help researchers communicate their work at the highest level, Lex has grown into a trusted international partner across the humanities, social sciences, and STEM. Her leadership of this business has given her extensive insight into the challenges and opportunities facing global higher education, from publication and funding pressures to cross-disciplinary collaboration. Straddling research and enterprise, she brings both the intellectual credibility of an Oxbridge-educated philosopher and scholar and the strategic vision of a business leader, making her uniquely placed to contribute within any research-intensive university.
